The national theme for International Women's Day 2019 is 'More Powerful Together'. Australian feminists are encouraged to forge alliances, coalitions and partnerships to progress gender equality. This presentation will draw on case studies and intersectional feminist principles to explore the importance of productive partnerships in research and community development work. What makes a good partnership between academic researchers and community-based organisations? How do we know we have a 'keeper' and when might we be better off going it alone?

Adele Murdolo is the Executive Director at the Multicultural Centre for Women's Health, a national centre of health promotion, research and advocacy, run by and for migrant and refugee women. Adele has a background in feminist research, a PhD in history and women's studies, and has specific expertise in intersectionality, violence against women and women's health. Adele is an Honorary Senior Research Fellow with the Centre for Health Equity.
