COVID-19 presents significant challenges for government, community and business that require the expertise of researchers from across all academic disciplines. While many researchers are already working together, new challenges are emerging in the current crisis which create new opportunities for generating collaborative partnerships. Melbourne Law School and Melbourne School of Population and Global Health are interested in developing connections between researchers to facilitate new research collaborations on the challenges for health and social policy raised by COVID-19.

This seminar will feature short presentations from researchers in both schools on research at the intersection of health and law, and possible opportunities for collaboration in response to COVID-19 and beyond.
